Smoke-free home rule is definitely good policy for Quebec. A province where many families are already facing financial hardship due to the high cost of living, and where many kids have asthma because of increased air pollution, a bylaw that allows people to smoke in their homes would be a step backward for most families. Yet despite the risks, the Parti Québécois government has decided to pass a law that will create a hard sell for provinces looking to ban smoking in private homes, and a hot one for others that are considering the move. The new law, passed unanimously in the National Assembly last week, will create a framework for a referendum to ban smoking in private homes. Although the proposed law gives the province's Chief Electoral Officer the authority to call for a referendum, the rules will only be enforced when a province has signed a comprehensive agreement with Ottawa. Story continues below advertisement The proposed law does not ban smoking in private homes, but it does create a framework for a referendum to ban smoking in private homes, a step that only six provinces – British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island – have already taken. The PQ's law simply formalizes the process for a province to hold a referendum on banning smoking in private homes. Smoking in private homes was banned in New Brunswick in 2014 after a vote that saw 57 per cent of voters back the ban. British Columbia last year passed legislation that banned smoking in public and private workplaces and partially restricted smoking in public places, an attempt to protect the health of residents and tourists. Manitoba in 2011 held a referendum that saw 75 per cent of voters support restricting smoking in private homes. f678ea9f9e
